

The Relationship Between Income Inequality and Energy Consumption: A Pareto Optimal Approach

Received: December 15, 2020 Revised: March 06, 2021 Accepted: March 15, 2021

Abstract

This paper analyzes the relationship between income distribution and energy consumption from a Pareto optimal approach. For this purpose, the causality relationship between electricity consumption per capita (kWh) with respect to country groups and energy consumption per capita (kg of oil equivalent) along with gross domestic product per capita was analyzed. In addition to this purpose, a Pareto analysis was conducted to determine the countries with the highest per capita national income, how much of the world total energy they consume, and whether the law of power in the energy and electricity markets exists. Finally, the impact of official development assistance provided to low-income countries by high-income countries on the low-income countries' electricity and energy consumption was analyzed. In other words, it was questioned whether pareto redistribution policies serve the purpose or not. The Engle-Granger causality approach was used in the analysis of the causality relationship between variables. Our analysis indicated that, first, the energy data of the country groups may be inadequate in revealing income inequalities. Second, the existence of Pareto law of power and global income inequality can be explained based on energy data. Finally, Pareto optimal redistribution policies to eliminate income inequality remain inadequate in practice.

1. Introduction

One of the current issues regarding the economy is income distribution, which is the basic indicator of the distinction between equality and inequality. Fair and balanced distribution of income is also important for the sustainability of individual and social welfare. According to the classical view, inequality in income distribution leads to capital accumulation. Inequality directs a significant part of capital to prosperous individuals with a high marginal propensity to save; thus, capital accumulation increases, and the growth accelerates. According to the modern view, justice or equality in income distribution encourages investment in human capital which accelerates economic growth and reduces income inequality (Byrns & Stone, 1997; Lee, 2019; Ruffin & Gregory, 2000). Studies of income inequality and growth are generally shaped around these two theories. However, the issue that has not yet been completely resolved is the causes of income inequality and conceivable solutions (Hasanov & Israeli, 2011; Kaymak, 2014).

One of the main reasons for economic inequality is that wages are determined by the market. Information, skills, and educational opportunities that are distributed unevenly are also among the causes of inequality (Nar, 2020a; Stiglitz, 2013). Personal factors also lead to income inequality, as enumerated below. The initial ownership of the goods, that is, the degree that production is possessed by an individual determines the difference in income (Leung, 2015). Innate talent differences play a role in determining wealth among individuals (Messmore, 2012). The gender gap is another factor contributing to income inequality (Jain-Chandra, 2015). Technological development also leads to unemployment and income inequality (Leung, 2015). As a result of financial globalization, foreign direct investments and portfolio investments increase. Technology-intensive foreign capital inflows contribute to the increase in income by increasing the
