Excerpt from Report of the Proceedings of the Twenty Fourth Annual Convention of the American Railway Master Mechanics Association Held at Cape May N J June 16 17 and 18 1891 There are two ways in which motive power officers can decrease the cost of transportation These are the making of locomotives more economical in the use of fuel and the reducing of the wages account by making them pull heavier trains Fuel is the most expensive item in motive power accounts and it naturally receives the greatest attention The efforts to reduce the consumption of fuel have led to decided improvements in the proportions of locomotives In the past When little attention was bestowed upon the economical use of fuel the tendency was to make the cylinders too large for the boiler With the result that the boiler was intensely forced to generate steam used by the cylinders This defect is being rapidly corrected Larger boilers are being applied to over cylindered locomotives and a striking feature about all new locomotives is the liberal size of boilers The economy that results from the improved proportions is materially reducing the cost of moving trains and still there is no disposition manifested by the members to rest and be satisfied that nothing better can be done The efforts to still improve the motive power are increasing This progressive sentiment has been manifested during the past year in the introduction by several railroad companies of compound locomotives and the results are highly encouraging The activity of our members in striving to improve the machinery under their charge may be judged by the work of investigation
