Captain John Smith Saves Jamestown

Captain John Smith Saves Jamestown

Other nations besides Spain were interested in establishing colonies, especially after Cortés conquered the Aztecs of Mexico and Pizarro the Incas of Peru. In both cases, they took large quantities of gold from the natives. Portuguese sailors moved down the coast of Africa, and their ships came back with gold, ivory, and slaves. England was also interested, but their explorer, John Cabot, found no great wealth, and only a few Englishmen were interested in colonizing. Sir Humphrey Gilbert tried to establish a colony in Newfoundland in 1583, but he died at sea, and the settlers returned after a cold winter. In 1585, Sir Walter Raleigh sent 107 settlers to Roanoke Island (North Carolina), but this colony disappeared.

Establishing colonies was too expensive for any one person to afford. A new system developed: the joint-stock company. Groups of people would each put up part of the cost and receive a share of the profits. The Tobacco Company landed in Roanoke and the East India Company in India. In 1606, the London Company was formed, and it sent 144 settlers to establish a colonial settlement at Jamestown in Virginia. One of those men was 27-year-old John Smith.

Smith's mother was ill when he was young (he was never to see her). He had been raised aboard a ship and had taught the Turks. The Turks captured him and held him in a slave with a chain around his neck. He escaped and finally returned to England in 1594. When he learned about the opportunity to create a new colony, he signed up. He was supposed to be a member of the council for the colony, but after arguing with the ship's captain, Smith finished the voyage in chains.

Smith was released after a jury trial. In December 1607, Smith was captured by the Native Americans living in the area, but the chief's daughter, Pocahontas, risked her life to save him. When he returned to Jamestown, he was arrested and charged with causing the deaths of the first men rather than going with him into Native American country. After he was found not guilty, he was elected council president.

The colony was in danger of starvation, despite the fact that the soil was good and plenty of food could be found. But food was scarce because the men were absent, and the Indians were nearby. But the men who came were looking for quick riches, so they worked less and spent the day hunting for gold nuggets. They wanted to get rich and go home. They ignored the danger that every man must work or would starve to death. The colonists began to grow. Indians on their hands as they killed birds and built houses. After Smith was injured by an explosion, he returned to England in 1609. The settlement in North America in 1612 and down maps of a region he named "New England." He was captured by pirates and then by the French in 1613. When he got home, he spent the rest of his life quickly writing books about his adventures.

1607-1610 Later, leaders of Virginia would continue to force settlers to work. The London Company never made any money from their colonies, but John Rolfe would take a local plant, tobacco, and export it to England. Pocahontas later married John Rolfe.
