Unmanned Aerial Vehicles Human Factors:

Human Factors of Remotely Operated Vehicles Nancy J. Cooke, 2006 The commonly used terms unmanned or uninhabited are misleading in the context of remotely operated vehicles In the case of Unmanned Aerial Vehicles UAVs there are many people involved on the ground ranging from those operating the vehicle from a ground control station to the people coordinating multiple UAVs in an air operations or air traffic control center The complexity of remote vehicle operations is also often underestimated and seen as a simple navigation task neglecting the more complex functions associated with remote camera operations data gathering and even weapons activity In addition trends in the military and civilian sectors involving reduced staffing increased number of vehicles to control and integration with other operations are associated with critical human factors issues For example the integration of UAVs with manned aircraft in the national airspace poses numerous human factors challenges In summary though these vehicles may be unmanned they are not unoperated unsupervised or uncontrolled The role of the human in these systems is critical and raises a number of human factors research and design issues ranging from multiple vehicle control and adaptive automation to spatial disorientation and synthetic vision The purpose of this book is to highlight the pressing human factors issues associated with remotely operated vehicles and to showcase some of the state of the art human oriented research and design that speaks to these issues In this book the human components of the unmanned system take center stage compared to the vehicle technology that often captures immediate attention
