

Making a Cave

Activity Source:

National Park Service. Developed by Kristen Lucke for the Views of the National Parks. Adapted with permission.

Background

We usually think of caves forming as rocks are dissolved and the particles are washed away, leaving hollow spaces behind. This activity simulates the way that dissolution, a chemical weathering process, leads to the formation of caves.

When precipitation such as rainwater or snowmelt mixes with carbon dioxide from the air and from decaying plants in the soil, the result is carbonic acid. This acidic water flows through cracks in the earth's surface and seeps into the rocks below. Once the acidic water reaches carbonate rocks and other rocks that dissolve readily, it dissolves away the rock to create passageways, rooms, and speleothems — cave formations.

Materials

Per student or small group:

- 4 ounces of modeling clay
- Sugar cubes (3-6 per cave)
- See-through bowl (cutting the top off a 2-liter bottle works well)
- Toothpick
- Spray bottle with warm water
- Lined paper
- Pen or pencil
