

as "high-risk" young adolescents, therefore, would require additional in-depth research that carefully assesses "cultural" and "experiential" influences on a variety of markers to assess or determine a student's "high-risk" status as opposed to students' cultural characteristics, regardless of their developmental status, or "high-risk" status when school and other school-associated issues are not considered relevant.

Directions: Students may discuss throughout the lesson that while students from Chapter 8, "Adolescence," may share common characteristics related to their culture, students that identify as "high-risk" or "at-risk" for academic achievement may actually represent more than one cultural influence. For example, how does this affect the issue?

Ex. "How did you feel after being at [school] for the first time?"

- Directions: Before the lesson, chapters of paragraphs, visualization, and/or by the first 10 minutes. This may help students understand the concept of "high-risk" and "at-risk" status.
