

intersection of the zero range line and vertical line of the sight on the mark for the sight.

b. Issue test targets may be in error. They can be tested by first adjusting sights on a distant aiming point and then checking to see if the same adjustment is correct for the testing targets. A testing target should be made for each gun.

49. ADJUSTMENT OF SIGHTS FOR 1000-INCH FIRING. a. Unless offset targets are used for 1000-inch firing, the abnormally short range and the minimum target make it necessary to converge the line of sighting and the center line (axis) of the gun at the target. This is accomplished by "targeting" the gun at 1000 inches, that is, adjusting the sight so the point of aim and point of strike of the bullet coincide at this range. The 600-yard range mark is used instead of the zero range mark.

b. The reason for this artificial distortion of the line of sighting is explained to the gunner. Point out on a blackboard that for a life-size target at a proper range for service ammunition, the line of sighting and center line of the gun should always be parallel. The distortion used on the 1000-inch range causes increasingly great errors if the gun is aimed at more distant targets.

c. Normally, periscopic sights are used for 1000-inch firing as coaxial telescope mounts usually do not have sufficient adjustment to permit targeting at this range.

50. CHECKING ADJUSTMENT OF LINKAGE ARM. The linkage arm connecting the periscopic sight to the elevating mechanism may get out of adjustment.

To check the adjustment of the linkage arm, proceed as follows:

- a. Adjust the sight on a distant aiming point.
- b. Place the tank on a steep forward slope in order

a. A tank commander's greatest aid in adjusting line is his field glasses. Do not handle them roughly.

b. Memorize the reading for the eye on the interpupillary adjustment scale and on each dioptric scale.

c. Press the eye pieces lightly to the eyes so that the relation of the eyes to the glasses is constant, yet not so hard to be uncomfortable.

d. The lens shields should fit just beyond the eye sockets to prevent light from entering the eyes from any source other than the field glasses.

e. Do not observe through the glasses any longer than necessary at one time. This prevents unnecessary eye strain.

f. On cold days, hold the glasses to the forehead to prevent fogging.

g. Shorten the carrying strap on the glasses rest on the chest. They are quickly available and are less likely to be damaged by contact with turrets or other parts of material.
