

An aerial photograph of an industrial or commercial area, featuring large blue-roofed buildings, parking lots with several vehicles, and surrounding greenery. A large, white, curved structural element, likely part of a wind turbine, dominates the foreground, extending from the left side across the top of the frame. The background shows a body of water and distant hills under a clear sky.

develop artificial intelligence AI programs to evaluate different design strategies and optimize urban wind energy The database includes experimental wind tunnel velocities and turbulence intensities for terrain roughness channeling effect typical building shapes and several city configurations for several turbine locations Wind velocities and turbulence intensities measured at the street level and rooftop turbines on rectangular U shaped and L shaped buildings are further investigated with literature CFD results Through the different combinations of experimental results and literature a total of over 150 cases are added to the database A decisional flow chart is developed using the results database and served as a results summary and an aid for programming the artificial intelligence AI networks The elaborated database is implemented in an expert system and an artificial neural network The AI programs are tested with city configurations models and a real case study Ren L vesque Boulevard in downtown Montreal Comparing the testing set to the actual experimental values the data expert system predicts the modification in wind velocities with 68% 98 curacy The feedforward artificial neural network developed is slightly more accurate than the expert system showing success rates from 76% to 99% Thus AI tools and the decisional flow chart approach may be used for a preliminary assessment of the different design strategies power capture in urban environment Urban Wind Power Utilization Haleh Ghazanfarpour, Central Washington University.
