LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

The U.S. Congress is the legislative branch of the federal government. It is composed of two chambers: the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The Senate is made up of 100 members, with two senators from each state. The House of Representatives is made up of 435 members, with the number of representatives from each state determined by population.

Both chambers have the power to pass laws, approve or reject the President's appointments and veto the President's vetoes. The Senate also has the power to ratify or reject treaties and to impeach and remove federal judges.

The House of Representatives has the power to initiate revenue bills and to impeach federal officials. The Senate must approve any bill passed by the House before it can become law. The President must sign any bill passed by both chambers before it can become law.

The U.S. Congress is the primary lawmaking body of the federal government. It is responsible for passing laws that govern the country and for overseeing the executive branch.

The U.S. Congress is a bicameral legislature, meaning it has two chambers. The Senate is the upper chamber and the House of Representatives is the lower chamber. Both chambers have the power to pass laws, approve or reject the President's appointments and veto the President's vetoes.
