Preventing Violence Against Women and Children Institute of Medicine, Board on Global Health, Forum on Global Violence Prevention, 2011-09-12 Violence against women and children is a serious public health concern with costs at multiple levels of society Although violence is a threat to everyone women and children are particularly susceptible to victimization because they often have fewer rights or lack appropriate means of protection In some societies certain types of violence are deemed socially or legally acceptable thereby contributing further to the risk to women and children In the past decade research has documented the growing magnitude of such violence but gaps in the data still remain Victims of violence of any type fear stigmatization or societal condemnation and thus often hesitate to report crimes The issue is compounded by the fact that for women and children the perpetrators are often people they know and because some countries lack laws or regulations protecting victims Some of the data that have been collected suggest that rates of violence against women range from 15 to 71 percent in some countries and that rates of violence against children top 80 percent These data demonstrate that violence poses a high burden on global health and that violence against women and children is common and universal Preventing Violence Against Women and Children focuses on these elements of the cycle as they relate to interrupting this transmission of violence Intervention strategies include preventing violence before it starts as well as preventing recurrence preventing adverse effects such as trauma or the consequences of trauma and preventing the spread of violence to the next generation or social level Successful strategies consider the context of the violence such as family school community national or regional settings in order to determine the best programs

Primary Prevention of Violence Higher Education Center for Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Violence Prevention (ED), 2010 Violence is a serious problem on college campuses The literature on primary prevention of violence does not call for the adoption of specific programs or policies but rather suggests a paradigm shift in the way practitioners approach violence Primary prevention means asking the question Why is violence happening in the first place in order to identify and change the underlying conditions that lead to violence A number of factors contribute to violent incidents at the peer institutional community and policy levels in addition to individual factors According to the WHO these factors can then be addressed with targeted interventions across these levels simultaneously Understanding local factors that contribute to violent incidents is critical to inform program development because the specific factors that lead to violence may differ by type of violence and context While much of the dialogue about primary violence prevention has occurred in the research on community violence prevention efforts those who focus on campus violence prevention can benefit from this work This primary violence prevention concept already has begun to make its way into campus prevention One example is the American College Health Association's 2008 publication Shifting the Paradigm Primary Prevention of Sexual Violence a toolkit that encourages the adoption of comprehensive primary prevention efforts that employ a combination of strategies to address multiple contributing factors These factors include knowledge and attitudes that support violence skills to intervene in violence and its precursors norms and policy and enforcement approaches to convey community standards Contains 1 resource
