Awareness in Global Virtual Teams

Chyng-Yang Jang,2003 This study investigated the antecedents and impacts of awareness in global virtual teams Awareness is a broad construct that reflects the extent to which people participating in a collaborative activity possess relevant information about aspects of their teammates or teammates work The purpose of this study was to integrate the concept of awareness into the literature of work group study Specifically the effects of perceived task structure communication frequency and groupware usage on perceived awareness were examined In addition the effects of awareness along with task interdependence on trust and solution agreement were also explored Participants were recruited from universities in the United States Mexico and Russia to form 7 distributed engineering design teams Each team consisted of students from 2 locations and was offered a set of communication tools including an ISDN based video conferencing system VTEL Microsoft Netmeeting telephone fax a project specific email account and a web based groupware tool known as TeamSCOPE The results showed that perceived task interdependence and communication frequency had positive effects on perceived level of awareness Additionally the effect of communication frequency on perceived awareness was moderated by perceived task interdependence Results also showed that participants reliance on real time meetings with distant teammates for awareness was positively associated with increased perceived task interdependence and contributed to a higher level of perceived awareness However no effect of TeamSCOPE usage on perceived awareness was found Further discussion on awareness demands is provided Both perceived task interdependence and awareness were positively associated with trust Multiple regression analysis showed that perceived awareness was the more significant predictor of trust No effect was found between awareness and solution agreement These results suggest that awareness is an important group process variable It provides a link between task interdependence and trust To stay updated with their distant teammates virtual team participants need adequate media support to match their awareness demand Organizations should reduce the barriers of using synchronous communication channels for virtual teams especially for those working on high interdependent tasks
