

Abstract A representative 10th-grade science teacher from a large urban school district in the United States was interviewed about her perceptions of the science curriculum and her teaching practices. The teacher's perceptions of the science curriculum and her teaching practices were analyzed using grounded theory. The results of the study indicate that the teacher perceived the science curriculum to be a collection of topics to be covered, rather than a coherent body of knowledge. She also perceived the science curriculum to be a collection of facts to be memorized, rather than a body of knowledge to be understood. Her teaching practices were consistent with these perceptions, as she focused on covering the topics and facts, rather than on understanding the concepts. The results of this study have implications for science education, as they suggest that the science curriculum should be reorganized to be a coherent body of knowledge, and that teachers should be encouraged to use teaching practices that focus on understanding the concepts.
