Wetlands are amazing ecosystems and can be found all over the United States. They occur along the boundaries of streams, lakes, ponds or even in large shallow holes that fill up with rainwater. In order to have a wetland, you need to have some low-lying land, add water, then mix in lots of plants that love having wet "feet" (roots) and finally add some animals. There are many kinds of wetlands: marshes, bogs, swamps, fens, and prairie potholes to name a few. These places can look very different, but because they are all areas with wet soil, or where water covers the soil, they are considered wetlands.

What type of wetlands are near you?

Every critter plays an important part in a healthy wetland. From primary producers, on up the food chain of consumers to decomposers, everything is connected.

Draw a line from the terms below to the plants or animals you see on this page that fit that level of the food chain!

primary producer

primary consumer

secondary consumer

tertiary consumer

decomposer

Cut out the squares below and place them over parts of the picture that serve the described function of a wetland.

For more information on the definitions of the food chain terms and suggestions for further study, see Extra Credit.

Habitat

More than 1/3 of endangered and threatened animals and plants in the United States depend on wetlands for some part

Food

Wetlands are very productive because of all of plants they contain. These form the base of the food chain

Filtration

Wetlands are great at filtering water coming off the land, collecting pollutants so they don't flow off further or get into groundwater

Nursery

Wetlands provide nursery habitat for many of the animals (young) fish and shellfish that we eat

Flood Control

By storing the water during floods, wetlands reduce flood damage in areas downstream and around them
