Some children copy a square in the following fashion. Such constructions indicate that these children have seen the corners and realize something should be done about them. However, despite the ability to perceive and to reproduce the straight vertical and horizontal lines of which the square is composed, they have not been able to organize these components. If they had been able to do so, they would have at least drawn something like this. Children who organize the lines in such a manner nearly always go on to complete four corners.
