Experimental Study on Impact Crushing of Granite Particles Jian-hong Yang,Qi Chen,Jian-hua Zhou,Huai-ying Fang,2018 To study the specific influences of production parameters and structural parameters on a vertical shaft impact crusher VSI a pneumatic impact crushing device was designed and used to study the influence of different impact velocities impact angles and initial particle sizes on the crushing effect for granite particles The resulting grains size distribution GSD and the actual crushing ratio ACR were determined via mechanical sieving and image processing where the experimental results showed that with increasing initial impact velocity the degree of fragmentation of the granite particles increased However when the impact velocity increased beyond a certain amount the trend became more moderate Further there existed an optimum original particle size that allowed the degree of fragmentation of the particle to obtain a maximum value Further as the initial impact angle of the particles increased the degree of fragmentation of granite particles exhibited a downward trend Through the experimental study herein it is found that the actual production parameters and structural parameters have significant effects on the impact crushing According to these results we can obtain valuable routines to guide the optimal design of the VSI
