

The importance of the availability of water and sanitation is an undeniable reality and international development cannot disregard the importance of water and sanitation for all who inhabit communities and who consume, consequently, resources to meet either the demands of basic and essential services or basic necessities and well-being processes, such as education, health, the supply chain, agriculture, urban development, etc. An additional concern is that, although the United Nations has established that a development agenda 5, and that a universal water is provided. The agenda sets the objective of free access to the supply of local services. It also shows awareness of the need to develop existing processes and includes the capacity-building of water utility professionals, introducing them to fulfill their objectives by paying for the services received.

Water and Sanitation Services Provisioning Paul Kariuki, 2010-12 The importance of the availability of water and sanitation is not debatable National and international development agencies recognize the importance of water and sanitation for not only human consumption but also economic development However in most places the provision of water and sanitation services is poor Inequities also exist in service provision mostly in urban settlements The supply driven approach which is government driven is not addressing consumer demands fully It is recommended that a demand driven approach one which is consumer driven be promoted This approach puts the consumer at the centre of the delivery of basic services It also allows consumers to participate in decision making processes and recognizes that consumers come first in service delivery Furthermore it encourages them to honour their obligations by paying for the services received

Consumers Count Mike Muller, Robin Simpson, Meike van

Ginnekan,2012 This note presents tools that can help make service providers more accountable to the people they serve The voice of users is often muted in water utilities One consequence is that utilities do not take account of users priorities and preferences The utility in turn loses the trust and cooperation of the community that it is supposed to serve The result is often service deterioration further alienating users Traditionally users relied on politicians to maintain oversight of budgets and compliance with rules and to intervene on their behalf when services failed This institutionalized a long route of accountability from user to political representative to service provider Modern approaches to public management seek to hold service providers more directly accountable to their users for the outcomes of their work Providers are expected to ensure that water flows safely and reliably from taps that blocked drains are cleared and that services are accessible and affordable to all Accountability in this context is about establishing a direct short route between users and service providers Tools for accountability cannot by themselves provide sustainable water services But their use can contribute to this goal by improving utility practices and the utility s policy and institutional environment
