Seth Kahn, Director of Composition at West Chester University, gives students the following instructions for peer review:

While reading your classmate's draft,

- Find at least five or six places you want information/details you're not getting, and ask for them as specifically as possible;
- Mark the center of gravity in the narrative, whatever you think is the most interesting or important part of the story; and
- Mark the passage where you like the writing best, and try to explain in a sentence or two what you like about it.

Kahn then follows up with in class revision sessions where students address peers' responses. This method focuses students on ideas, requires them to use specific language, and provides some structure for the revision that should follow peer review.
