

Summary Writing as a Critical School Improvement Strategy

by John Collins, EdD

With all the strategies available to improve schools, why emphasize summary writing? Quite simply, our students need to read more to expand their subject-specific background knowledge and their academic vocabularies. The best way to encourage the careful reading of nonfiction texts that will add content and vocabulary knowledge is to ask students to summarize, in writing, what they have read.

Why the Emphasis on Summary Writing

Marilyn Jager Adams describes the decline of reading skills, especially in the upper grades, in her extensively researched article “Advancing Our Students’ Language and Literacy” in the American Educator. Jager Adams carefully reviews the literacy achievement data from 1960 through 2010 and concludes, “The literacy level of our secondary students is languishing because the kids are not reading what they need to be reading” (p.3). This is primarily because school textbooks have become easier to read over the last 50 years while newspapers and other texts have not or, in the case of scientific magazines, “had increased dramatically [in reading difficulty] from 1930 to 1990” (p.5). For example, American textbooks’ sentence length has decreased from an average of 20 words in 1962 to 14 today.

In light of this information, one might conclude that teachers can lecture about content to help close the information and complexity gap, but then we are faced with another difficult fact: “The richness and complexity of the words used in oral language samples paled in comparison with written texts” (p.5). Students need the experience of reading complex texts because written language is more difficult: The words are more precise, the concepts are more elaborated, and syntax is more complex.

Reading complex, subject-related text helps students begin to overcome what has been popularly called the “Matthew effect,” which describes why good readers become better and poor readers become poorer as each year goes by. Our non-reading students are constantly falling behind because their store of background knowledge and academic vocabulary is not growing. Once students get beyond basic decoding, we need to help them expand what E. D. Hirsch (2003) calls students “word and world knowledge” (p. 21), which brings us back to summary writing.
