Opioid Dependence Abraham Wikler, 2013-06-29 A major problem in the treatment of opioid dependence has been the persistence of relapse despite detoxification and enforced prolonged abstinence from drug use with or without conventional psychotherapy and other efforts at rehabilitation Both initial addiction and subsequent relapses are usually ascribed to the quest for opioid produced euphoria in persons with character disorders This formulation is in accord with one half of the common sense pleasure pain principle but it ignores the other half namely the long lasting dysphoric consequences of repeated opioid use distressing abstinence phenomena sexual disturbances disruption of marital status unemployment entanglement in criminal activities arrests and imprisonment In any case the pleasure pain principle is an empty tautology since it is incapable of refutation by any conceivable objective data that might seem contradictory inasmuch as it can be saved by invocation of untestable unconscious intervening variables Less tied to the pleasure pain principle is the view that relapse is due to long lasting sequelae of previous opioid addiction resulting from complex conditioning processes both operant and classical involving pharmacological environmental social and personal variables In this view relapse is not simply a re enactment of initial opioid use but is a disease sui generis a disease of its own kind The factors contributing to this disease sui generis are reviewed in this book

Suboxone Versus Methadone for the Treatment of Opioid Dependence, 2013 Addiction to opioids causes major medical social and economic problems to both the individual and society Opioid dependence is defined as a strong desire to use the substance difficulty in controlling its use the presence of a physiological withdrawal state tolerance of the use of the drug neglect of alternative pleasures and interests and persistent use of the drug despite harm to oneself and others It is a complex disease involving physiological psychological genetic behavioral and environmental factors In Canada it is estimated that there were more than 80 000 regular illegal opioid users in 2003 The number of illegal drug related overdose deaths in Canada was 958 in 2002 Opioid dependence is related to the abuse of not only illegal opioid drugs e g heroin but also some of the most commonly prescription drugs such as codeine containing Tylenol hydromorphone oxycodone morphine and others Treatment of opioid dependence includes three approaches stabilization detoxification and maintenance Stabilization is usually achieved by opioid substitution treatments to ensure that the drug use becomes independent of mental state such as craving and mood and independent of circumstances such as finance and physical location The next stage is detoxification that is to withdraw from opioids The final step is maintenance to prevent relapse Detoxification refers to the process by which the effects of opioid drugs are eliminated in a safe and effective manner such that withdrawal symptoms are minimized Appropriate use of the detoxification agents plays a crucial role in increasing the successful detoxification rate while minimizing the side effects and withdrawal symptoms Methadone opioid receptor agonist or buprenorphine opioid receptor agonist and opioid receptor antagonist are recommended first line treatments in opioid detoxification Naloxone is an opioid antagonist without agonist properties In opioid dependent patients naloxone precipitates withdrawal Suboxone buprenorphine naloxone was approved by Health Canada in 2007 for substitution treatment in opioid drug dependence in adults It is a fixed combination of buprenorphine a partial opioid receptor agonist with naloxone an opioid antagonist in a 4 : 1 ratio The addition of naloxone to buprenorphine is expected to decrease the intravenous abuse of buprenorphine because when taken sublingually absorption of naloxone is minimal however it can rapidly precipitate opioid withdrawal when injected Suboxone is recommended for the treatment of opioid dependence for patients in whom methadone is contraindicated such as patients at high risk of or with QT prolongation or hypersensitivity to methadone The purpose of this review is to provide evidence on the comparative clinical effectiveness and cost effectiveness of use of Suboxone compared with methadone for the treatment of patients with opioid dependence Subgroups such as children and pregnant women may also have access to opioids thus the clinical benefits and risks of Suboxone for these patients will be examined as well when evidence is available
