Mary Ehrenworth, Cornelius Minor, Mark Federman, James Jennings, Katherine Messer, & Christopher McCloud

When English, science, and history teachers collaborate with athletic coaches, they will find tremendous opportunities to intensify close reading, argumentation, and overall academic engagement.

If you were to visit a high school, including the fields and courts where students are practicing, you would find incredible teaching happening on the basketball court, on the bus, and in the locker room, including work on critical thinking, close reading, goal setting, responding to feedback, and constructing and defending arguments. A lot of this teaching is unrehearsed and undocumented. It is also transformative and could be more so if we honored it across a building. When you get students coming into school on Saturday morning for extra work, you want to study what kind of teaching made that happen. When you find students closely reading sports performances, including interpreting details to support evidence-based arguments, you want to name and hone those analytic skills and help students transfer them to other, academic work.

That is the work that we would like to invite others into. It builds on the work of many others, most especially the ideas of Richard Kent, Tom Newkirk, and John Hattie, and it is grounded in an ongoing think tank of athletic coaches and academic specialists that began in a public high school in New York City and spread to other secondary schools. We focus, in particular, on four areas where the potential for growth seems tremendous:

1. Democratizing close reading and analytic writing
2. Harnessing argumentation skills
3. Articulating vision
4. Studying coaching feedback
