

Building up the leaves.
10. Start to build up the layers on the flowers. Starting with the fully opened flower, apply a clear glaze down the centre of the lip, where the light hits it. Paint on a richer mix of the base pink, following the curve of the petal, and dragging the paint into the wet highlights. Do the same with the green from underneath. Soften any edges of the wash with a clean, damp brush to achieve a soft blend.

Applying a wetting wash.
11. When the surface detail has dried, use light brush-stroke to apply a very pale, water wash of dark pink over the darker areas of the flower. Soften the leading edge of the wash with water as you approach the highlights. When the dark pink wash is dry, repeat with the green. This will soften and unify the detail, and you can repeat the process again once it is dry to create more impact and add 'depth'. Build up as much colour as you need.

Applying the surface detail.
12. Add some more French ultramarine to the base pink mix (this makes it darker and more purple) and using the very tip of the brush start to apply the fine surface veining to the tip of the flower. (For pale veins, use a more watery wash.) The veins change from red to green as they go round the petal, so start with the darker pink mix and finish with the base light green.

Tip

You may wish to practise the technique in step 13 on a spare piece of paper first!

Continuing to add surface detail.
13. Apply the main green veins to the top petal, using the base light green mix and the very tip of the brush.

Softening the veins.
14. When the veins are drying, soften them by brushing them first and then lightly dabbing them with a piece of strong, absorbent kitchen towel.

15. Add the pink veins in the same way using the mix used in step 13, continuing from the ends of the green veins – just before they dry, glide over them with clear water – this will create a blend of colour around each vein. To prevent the paint from the pink veins running into each other, paint alternate veins, then go back and paint the ones in between.
