

OPPOSITE: L 9 covering the High Seas Fleet. (Mock)

The double catastrophe to L 3 and L 4 represented dearly bought experience in the development of Strasser's weather knowledge. Henceforth, until larger and more powerful airships were available, flights to the Skagerrak were rarely attempted.

Ever since von Pohl had taken command of the Fleet at the beginning of February, the German Navy had been on the defensive. Towards the middle of March the Fleet staff began making plans for a cautious excursion into the North Sea. In the words of Kapitän zur See von Trotha, one of the Navy's "activists," this excursion (and those that followed) were "only undertaken because it was certain that the Fleet could not find anything to attack,"² and only exposed its units to useless loss through mines and submarine attacks. The Naval Airship Division, however, came out of this operation with its credit higher than ever. "The undertaking was finally remarkable for the fact that . . . the airships were able for the first time to cooperate tactically with the Fleet, although they several times flew into heavy snow squalls."³ It is clear that neither von Pohl nor anyone else understood the possibility of using airships for long-distance strategic scouting — covering the remote areas of the North Sea to find where the British Grand Fleet in fact was located. Instead, von Pohl held them in a close defensive girdle around the Fleet, almost within sight of each other and of the flagship.

On March 29, the day of the operation, it at first seemed unlikely that the airships would be able to fly at all. Three of them should have sortied early,
