|-------------------------|---------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Psychoanalytic   | Freud                           | Emotional disorders spring from unconscious dynamics, such as unresolved sexual and other childhood conflicts, and fixation at various developmental stages. Defense mechanisms fend off anxiety. | Personality consists of pleasure-seeking impulses (the id), a reality-oriented executive (the ego), and an internalized set of ideals (the superego).                                                    | Free association, projective tests, dream analysis                                                      |
| Psychodynamic    | Jung, Adler, Horney             | The unconscious and conscious minds interact. Childhood experiences and defense mechanisms are important.                                                                                         | The dynamic interplay of conscious and unconscious motives and conflicts shapes our personality.                                                                                                         | Projective tests, therapy sessions                                                                      |
| Humanistic       | Rogers, Maslow                  | Rather than examining the struggles of sick people, it's better to focus on the ways healthy people strive for self-realization.                                                                  | If our basic human needs are met, we will strive toward self-actualization. In a climate of unconditional positive regard, we can develop self-awareness and a more realistic and positive self-concept. | Questionnaires, therapy sessions                                                                        |
| Trait            | Allport, Eysenck, McCrae, Costa | We have certain stable and enduring characteristics, influenced by genetic predispositions.                                                                                                       | Scientific study of traits has isolated important dimensions of personality, such as the Big Five traits (conscientiousness, agreeableness, neuroticism, openness, and extraversion).                    | Personality inventories                                                                                 |
| Social-Cognitive | Bandura                         | Our traits and the social context interact to produce our behaviors.                                                                                                                              | Conditioning and observational learning interact with cognition to create behavior patterns.                                                                                                             | Our behavior in one situation is best predicted by considering our past behavior in similar situations. |
