

This book is the result of understanding literature as a central part of children's education. Theory and sometimes theory words constitute a means to open strong debate and to help these understand/learn and why people – themselves included – do so that do, do so precisely through critical theory whatever they could find sufficient. The contemporary philosophical, cultural and pedagogical inquiries, Thinking through Children's Literature in the Classroom approaches the use of literature as a central focus in classroom activities not only to improve their literary skills, but also to develop their human responsibility, one that prepares them to produce independent and sensible perceptions of the world. Of course, the relevance of learning young readers and clarifying their ability to think begins precisely by having well-read teachers who are comfortable about teaching and, secondly, by having students who are willing to learn. To encourage and sustain them through the critical focus of their own thinking processes, educators must surely display a sound pedagogical knowledge apart from being literary experts.

"The present volume addresses a range of issues, both theoretical and practical, around children's reading and education. From reader-theoretical questions regarding the boundaries of reading, education and children's literature, it moves to interdisciplinary approaches, addressing pedagogical settings in the public classroom for students to give literary responses and develop their cognitive ability to think critically. The contributors then take us into the classroom to provide hands-on tips, bringing reading and theory together, teaching together, and finally spread out in a wider social and cultural context, linking children's literature and other spheres of culture."
