DISCUSSION: This study was the first to compare the effects of a single session of a 10-min stretching routine on the heart rate variability (HRV) of healthy young adults. The results showed that the 10-min stretching routine significantly increased the HRV of the participants, suggesting that the routine may be beneficial for improving heart rate variability and overall cardiovascular health. The findings of this study have implications for the use of stretching as a non-pharmacological intervention for improving heart rate variability and overall cardiovascular health. Further research is needed to explore the long-term effects of the 10-min stretching routine on heart rate variability and overall cardiovascular health.
