"I loved you so precious you will always be my sister."

There were tears in Miriam's eyes as their foreheads touched and Rachel sobbed. "No more when. Always."

Now in its fourth year, the Amish settlement in Mexico is thriving. But as more settlers arrive, sons and daughters marry, babies are born, and crops grow thick, a storm looms on the horizon. And Caleb Bender knows—perhaps better than anyone—that the worst of storms don't come from the western skies.

They come on horseback.

When their very existence is threatened, the Amish turn to the Mexican government for help, only to discover that the rules of men are fickle and security is an illusion. Tried by fire and risen by war, Caleb and Dorothea come to understand that the kingdom of God is not to be found in land or buildings or gold or weapons, but in the hearts of peaceful men trying to feed their families.

Watching helplessly as daughters Rachel, Miriam, and Emma are drawn increasingly toward their separate destinies, Caleb is forced to confront the most important decision of his life.
