Indian, Persian, African, and Flowerland Legends and Fairy Tales Various Authors,2020-09-28 The boy came home unsuccessful Then his sister told him that he must not despair but try again the next day She accordingly left him again at the gathering place of the wood and returned to the lodge Toward nightfall she heard his little footsteps crackling through the snow and he hurried in and threw down with an air of triumph one of the birds which he had killed My sister said he I wish you to skin it and stretch the skin and when I have killed more I will have a coat made out of the skins But what shall we do with the body said she for they had always up to that time lived upon greens and berries Cut it in two he answered and season our pottage with one half of it at a time It was their first dish of game and they relished it greatly The boy kept on in his efforts and in the course of time he killed ten birds out of the skins of which his sister made him a little coat Being very small he had a very pretty coat and a bird skin to spare Sister said he one day as he paraded up and down before the lodge enjoying his new coat and fancying himself the greatest little fellow in the world as he was for there was no other besides him My sister are we really alone in the world or are we playing at it Is there nobody else living And tell me was all this great broad earth and this huge big sky made for a little boy and girl like you and me Ah no answered the sister there are many others but not harmless as you and I are They live in a certain other quarter of the earth and if we would not endanger our lives we must keep away from there They have killed off all our kinsfolk and will kill us too if we go near where they are To this the boy was silent but his sister s words only served to inflame his curiosity the more and soon after he took his bow and arrows and went in the forbidden direction After walking a long time and meeting no one he became tired and stretched himself upon a high green knoll where the day s warmth had melted off the snow It was a charming place to lie and he soon fell asleep While he slept the sun heat upon him It not only singed his bird skin coat but so shrivelled and shrunk and tightened it on the little boy s body as to wake him up And then when he felt how the sun had seared the coat he was so proud of and saw the mischief its fiery beams had played he flew into a great passion He vowed fearful things and berated the sun in a terrible way for a little boy no higher than a man s knee Do not think you are too high said he I shall revenge myself Oh sun I will have you for a plaything yet On coming home he gave an account of his misfortune to his sister and bitterly bewailed the spoiling of his new coat He would not eat not so much as a single berry He lay down as one that fasts nor did he move or change his manner of lying for ten full days though his sister strove to prevail on him to rise At the end of ten days he turned over and then he lay full ten days on the other side
