Using Scr Methods To Analyze Requirements Documentation Sudoc Nas 12619776:

Applying the SCR Requirements Specification Method to Practical Systems: A Case Study, 1996 Studies have shown that the majority of errors in software systems are due to incorrect requirements specifications The root cause of many requirements errors is the imprecision and ambiguity that arise because the software requirements are expressed in natural language An effective way to reduce such errors is to express requirements in a formal notation For a number of years researchers at the Naval Research Laboratory NRL have been working on a formal method based on tables to specify the requirements of practical systems 2 11 Known as the Software Cost Reduction SCR method this approach was originally formulated to document the requirements of the Operational Flight Program OFP for the U S Navy s A 7 aircraft 2 Since SCR s introduction more than a decade ago many industrial organizations including Lockheed Grumman and Ontario Hydro have used SCR to specify requirements Recently NRL has developed both a formal state machine model 12 14 to define the SCR semantics and a set of software tools to support analysis and validation of SCR requirements specifications 10 The tools support consistency and completeness checking simulation and model checking

Applying the SCR Requirements Method to the Light Control Case Study, 2000 To date the SCR Software Cost Reduction requirements method has been used in industrial environments to specify the requirements of many practical systems including control systems for nuclear power plants and avionics systems This paper describes the use of the SCR method to specify the requirements of the Light Control System LCS the subject of a case study at the Dagstuhl Seminar on Requirements Capture Documentation and Validation in June 1999 It introduces a systematic process for constructing the LCS requirements specification presents the specification of the LCS in the SCR tabular notation discusses the tools that we applied to the LCS specification and concludes with a discussion of a number of issues that arose in developing the specification
