Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness of 10-year-old children. The study was conducted in a primary school in the city of Ankara, Turkey. The study group consisted of 20 children (10 boys and 10 girls) who were randomly selected from the 10-year-old children in the school. The children were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The control group did not participate in any physical activity during the 12-week period, while the experimental group participated in a 12-week training program. The physical fitness of the children was measured at the beginning and at the end of the 12-week period. The results of the study showed that the experimental group had significantly higher levels of physical fitness than the control group at the end of the 12-week period. The results also showed that the 12-week training program had a positive effect on the physical fitness of 10-year-old children.

■ CONCLUSIONS The results of the present study suggest that the use of a single, standardized, and validated questionnaire is a feasible and reliable method for assessing the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems in a community sample. The results also suggest that the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems is higher in the community than in the clinical population. This finding is consistent with the idea that the community is a more heterogeneous population than the clinical population, and that the prevalence of mental health problems is higher in the community than in the clinical population.

Further, the structural components of the model are not mutually exclusive. For example, the model could be extended to include the effects of the social environment on the individual's perception of the risk of HIV infection. The model could also be extended to include the effects of the social environment on the individual's perception of the risk of HIV infection.
