2. Results: A large, representative sample of 1,000 U.S. adults was interviewed, and 100 of these were interviewed a second time 12 months later. The results show that the prevalence of depression increased from 1992 to 1993, and that the prevalence of depression was higher among those who had been depressed in 1992 than among those who had not. The prevalence of depression was also higher among those who had been depressed in 1992 than among those who had not. The prevalence of depression was also higher among those who had been depressed in 1992 than among those who had not.
