Goffin, Edward

Helmes, 2000-03-31 The assessment of individual differences has generated shockwaves affecting sociology education and a number of other behavioral sciences as well as the fields of management and organizational behavior In covering the assessment of individual differences this book pays tribute to the interests and activities that Douglas N Jackson has incorporated into his career as a psychologist He continues to be a leader in putting academic findings to practical use He has also inspired generations of students with his mastery of complex concepts and as a personal example of the ability to balance several simultaneous areas of research Consistent with the focus of Jackson s research the theme of this book will be how the use of deductive construct driven strategies in the assessment of individual differences leads to benefits in terms of the applicability of the assessment instruments and the clarity of the conclusions that can be drawn from the research

Most existing theoretical approaches to industrial relations and human resources management (IR/HRM) build their analyses and policy prescriptions on one of two foundational assumptions. They assume either that conflict between workers and employers is the natural and inevitable state of affairs or that under normal circumstances cooperation is what employers can and should expect from workers. By contrast, A New Theory of Industrial Relations: People, Markets and Organizations after Neoliberalism proposes a theoretical framework for IR/HRM that treats the existence of conflict or cooperation at work as an outcome that needs to be explained rather than an initial presupposition. By identifying the social and organizational roots of reasonably chosen cooperation at work, this framework shows what is needed to construct a genuinely consensual form of capitalism. In broader terms, the book offers a critical theory of the governance of work under capitalism.

The governance of work refers to the structures of incentives and sanctions authority accountability and direct and representative participation within and beyond the workplace by which decisions about the content conditions and remuneration of work are made applied challenged and revised The most basic proposition made in the book is that work will be consensual and hence that employees will actively and willingly cooperate with the implementation of organizational plans and strategies when the governance of work is substantively legitimate Although stable configurations of economic and organizational structures are possible in the context of a bare procedural legitimacy it is only where work relationships are recognized as right and just that positive forms of cooperation will occur The analytic purpose of the theory is to specify the conditions under which substantive legitimacy will arise Drawing in particular on the work of Alan Fox Robert Cox and Jürgen Habermas the book argues that whether workers fight against tolerate or willingly accept the web of relationships that constitutes the organization depends on the interplay between three empirically variable factors the objective day to day experience of incentives constraints and obligations at work the subjective understanding of work as a social relationship and the formal institutional structure of policies rules and practices by which relationships at work are governed Business Accounting: Theory of accounts, by H.D.
