Johnson, 2009 Popular portrayals have long depicted the American frontier of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries as a Wild West marked by violence This compelling volume by Marilyn Johnson explores the question of how violent the West truly was and what conditions made violence likely to occur By examining the case studies of the Johnson County range war in Wyoming and the Ludlow Massacre during the southern Colorado coal strike Johnson demonstrates that western violence in this period was a product of the transformation of the West from a rugged frontier to a capitalist market The introduction provides an overview of the range and mining wars that plagued the region and the specific cases the book examines The primary sources collected by Johnson including newspaper reports industrialists accounts union documents and personal memoirs offer a vivid portrait of tensions surrounding land use industrial development labor and race and
