

bugs over, and daintily swallowed them, one by one. The meal she made another pass in front of the log, her curious glance as she swam by. Then she disappeared into the depths.

Bagley stared after her for a long while. He'd been in sight of her about a month ago, from this same log, when he was little. And the hollow log, with its protection, was the ideal spot for croaking and watching the pond's ever-changing surface. Even so, he never saw her more than once a week. Since spotting the strange fish, he'd come every day.

The first time, of course, he'd had no bugs to eat. He'd just been staring idly at some gnats buzzing over the water. All of a sudden something blinded him. He'd looked up, and changing in the air, was a fish, the sun striking off her scales. She had dazzling eyes and glorious green scales. For a split second only her tail was in the water. She splashed back into the pond.

The sight left him spellbound. He'd never seen a fish like that again, as if she was scouting for more gnats. She'd been on the brink of the log. Usually he didn't speak to her, but they spoke to him. Striking up conversations led to names, and his name generally made a sensation.
