9 As they progress over the seat, move the hair with the fingers to open it up and blend the hair into the seat tape, with no lumps or hollow spots.

10 The hair being too to be well received by using a layer of cotton wool wadding, both under and over the fabric covering. The fabric is set onto the seat, four squares using temporary fabric at all four sides, and pulled to a good tightness.

11 The piece is then stretched out tightly towards the corners and back. The fabric is allowed to creep under or overlie with the backing.

Beginning at the back of the seat, near the fabric down and all back about 10 (2)cm apart. Once the fabric surface towards the front and to again. The seat sides are then dealt with in the same way.

12 Finally, stretch the fabric hard into each corner while and take down.

Check the edges for neatness as the fabric is put forward permanently home. If preferred, at the fringe for the fabric in a seat of the kind can be made with thin (or) grip pins, which are generally thin and have small heads. Another type of pin wedding is cut and carefully fixed to the outline of the seat then formed a few inches apart at the looking line.

13 Using grip pins, to a matching colour if possible, set the upholstery fabric onto the seat along the back edge. At this point the fabric is centred to ensure that any stripes or patterns are kept up with the centre of the chair seat. A tape measure can be used if necessary. The cover is now stretched and fixed using the sequence that was used for the fabric. Lift grip pins where necessary and adjust the tension of the fabric to create an even edge facing, before hammering them home permanently. Turn the upholstery fabric close to the looking line to ensure a finish which is in line and parallel with the chair seat rail edges.

14 An Oxford grip was chosen for the seat finish. This was glued down with a clear fabric adhesive and the grip was carefully mixed at each corner. The starting point for a fixed or grip finish is usually just inside one of the back corners.
