Abstract—This paper reports on a study of the impact of a 10-week, 12-session, self-paced, self-administered, computer-based program on the self-efficacy and self-management skills of 100 people with type 2 diabetes. The program was designed to help people with type 2 diabetes learn to manage their condition by providing information on the disease, its complications, and how to manage it. The program was evaluated using a pretest-posttest design. The results of the study showed that the program had a significant positive impact on the self-efficacy and self-management skills of the participants. The program was found to be effective in increasing the participants' knowledge of the disease and its complications, and in improving their self-management skills. The program was also found to be acceptable and feasible for use in a community setting. The results of this study suggest that the program could be a valuable tool for helping people with type 2 diabetes learn to manage their condition.
