The Emic and Etic Teaching Perspectives of Traditional Ghanaian Dance-drumming Mitchell J. Greco,OhioLINK Electronic Theses and Dissertations Center,2014 Globalization has brought traditional Ghanaian drum dances to world stages particularly in institutions of higher education in America Ethnomusicologists utilize interdisciplinary techniques to trace a music cultures continuation and change This study compares the transmission process in the cultural context and the instruction of Ghanaian repertoire among African ensembles in American college and universities The original hypothesis contends that the pedagogy in university African ensembles would be profoundly different from that of the authentic Ghanaian perspective thereby reinforcing a divergence in music cognition between learners in the two cultures Part I Introduction establishes the parameters of the research and provides a brief description of the Ghanaian musical context The

Research Design section provides an explanation of the participant observer research methodology during my fieldwork in Ghana and the United States as well as a briefing on the comparative method used between the two cultures Insight into teaching perspectives and student cognition that resulted from the variables of different pedagogical techniques was gained through observing of multiple university African ensembles in rehearsal and performance Interviews were conducted and questionnaires were collected for hard data Features of the music culture vital to the socialization method and music cognition are addressed with particular attention given to the intersubjective collectiveness found in nearly every facet of West African life and the emic musical concepts of melorhythm and Ensemble Thematic Cycle E T C The bulk of the fieldwork is presented in Part 2 Teaching Techniques and Learning Processes The first section surveys the teaching and learning perspectives of the traditional socialization methods of the Ghanaian people The oral method and informal style are clarified and further non written methods and instances of formality found in certain Ghanaian contexts are explained The second section covers teaching and learning as it occurs in the ensembles found in American colleges and universities Large repertoires of teaching strategies encompassing oral visual and kinesthetic methods were witnessed from different demographics of instructors Ghanaian American and other African origins The cognition of the students participating in the ensembles were equally as diverse but commonalities in their learning process were apparent University African ensembles that perform Ghanaian drum dances differ significantly based on the institution department community and instructor They operate under the format of a performance ensemble study group or a division of the percussion ensemble Based on the evidence found the course objectives and goals were found to be a main determinant of pedagogy and style This conclusion diverges significantly from the classification system commonly applied in our field which views an instructor s ethnicity and musical background as the major influences When building their pedagogical strategies it was clear that instructors consider their own experience as well as the objective of their ensemble The research also brought information regarding student learning and music cognition to the forefront There are many factors that go into a participant s experience and therefore his or her cognition of the foreign musical system A major influence towards an emic and etic perspective may be a result of the differing function that the music culture has in the two societies while the emic function seeks to maintain social values the etic function may be to construct an appreciation of another cultures non music students to introduce a different music perspective music students or to develop hand drumming skills percussionists A connection between instruction and learning is made as pedagogy found within university ensembles across the country is unsystematic and inconsistent Some pedagogical techniques appeared to encourage emic perspectives such as melorhythm Ensemble Thematic Cycle E T C and the significance of singing and dancing On the other hand some techniques reinforced students etic Western perspectives such as a visual approach Western soloing and establishing external points of reference

Musicians' Migratory Patterns: The African Drum as Symbol in Early America Christopher Johnson, 2019-10-16 Musicians Migratory Patterns The African Drum as Symbol in Early America questions the ban that was placed on the African drum in early America It shows the functional use of the drum for celebrations weddings funerals religious ceremonies and nonviolent communication The assumption that drums and horns were used to communicate in slave revolts is undone in this study Rather this volume seeks to consider the social place of the drum for both blacks and whites of the time using the writings of Europeans and colonial era Americans the accounts of African American free persons and slaves the period instruments and numerous illustrations of paintings and sculpture The image of the drum was effectively appropriated by Europeans and Americans who wrote about African American culture particularly in the nineteenth century and re appropriated by African American poets and painters in the early twentieth century who recreated a positive nationalist view of their African past Throughout human history cultural objects have been banned by one group to be used another objects that include books religious artifacts and ways of dress This study unlocks a metaphor that is at the root of racial bias the idea of what is primitive while offering a fresh approach by promoting the construct of multiple points of view for this social historical presentation
