A Critical Appraisal of Energy Assessments of Biofuel Production Systems: A standardized overview of literature data on herbaceous and woody crops Mario Giampietro,Sergio Ulgiati,David Pimentel,1997 Breaking the Link Between Food and Biofuels Bruce Alan Babcock,2008 Production of biofuels from feedstocks that are diverted from food production or that are grown on land that could grow crops has two important drawbacks higher food prices and decreased reduction in greenhouse gas emissions If U S policy were to change and place greater emphasis on food prices and greenhouse gas reductions then we would transition away from current feedstocks toward those that do not reduce our ability to produce food Examples of such feedstocks include crop residues algae municipal waste jatropha grown on degraded land and by products of edible oil production Policy options that would encourage use of these alternative feedstocks include placing a hard cap on ethanol and biodiesel production that comes from corn and refined vegetable oil thereby forcing growth in biofuel production to come from alternative feedstocks differentiation of tax credits and subsidies so that the alternative feedstocks receive a higher incentive than do corn and refined vegetable oil and greatly increased funding for research to hasten the feasibility of producing and refining alternative feedstocks      Biofuels Impact on Crop and Food Prices Scott Leonard Baier, 2009 This paper examines the effect that biofuels production has had on commodity and global food prices The innovative contribution of this paper is the interactive spreadsheet that allows the reader to choose the assumptions behind the estimates By allowing the reader to choose the country time period supply and demand elasticities and the size of indirect effects we explicitly illustrate the sensitivity of the estimated effect of biofuels production on prices Our best estimates suggest that the increase in biofuels production over the past two years has had a sizeable impact on corn sugar barley and soybean prices but a much smaller impact on global food prices P 1      Biofuel Policies and Programs , 2009
