discussed in metaethics that mix description and evaluation such as lewd chaste generous or selfish This book argues that in employing such terms speakers not only say something purely factual about people and things but also presuppose certain values as if they were common ground among the conversation participants Cepollaro illustrates how this linguistic mechanism effectively explains the pervasive social and moral effects of evaluative language Using a multidisciplinary approach she tackles issues in philosophy of language linguistics ethics and metaethics Moreover the theoretical investigation takes into consideration and discusses empirical data from psychology and experimental philosophy
