

Abstract A representative 10th-grade science teacher in a large urban school district in the United States was interviewed about her beliefs and practices regarding the use of technology in the science classroom. The teacher's responses were analyzed using a grounded theory approach. The results of the study indicate that the teacher's beliefs and practices regarding the use of technology in the science classroom were influenced by a variety of factors, including her own experiences with technology, her beliefs about the role of technology in education, and the resources available to her. The teacher's beliefs and practices were also influenced by the needs of her students and the demands of the curriculum. The study suggests that teacher education programs should provide opportunities for teachers to explore their beliefs and practices regarding the use of technology in the science classroom and to develop strategies for addressing the needs of their students and the demands of the curriculum.

1. The first step is to identify the problem. This involves understanding the situation and the goals that need to be achieved.
