The purpose of the present research was to test the proposed model designed to increase reliability. First, questions of reliability, validity, generalizability, and the internal consistency of the scales were tested. Then, the model was tested using a convenience sample representing the target population of university students. The responsibility of using the present tool within each classroom is dependent on teaching staff, a decision which also involves issues of confidentiality, security, and access to the data (see <http://www.pearsoned.com>).

The average child has 4,000 missing teeth and with timely treatment and successful dental care, parents can ensure their children's permanent dentition is better served for a longer period by reducing contact with oral acids. The steps to doing so, experts found, include when a parent has identified a problem, they should be able to determine if the child is at risk of dental decay, and if so, they should be able to take steps to prevent it.
