Toward a Unified Theory of Problem Solving Mike U. Smith, 1991 One of the most active fields of educational research in recent years has been the investigation of problem solving performance Two opposing views of current research one suggesting that there are more differences than similarities within different domains and the other stating that there is great similarity lead to a variety of questions Is problem solving a single construct Are there aspects of problem solving performance that are similar across a variety of content domains What problem solving skills learned within one context can be expected to transfer to other domains The purpose of this book is to serve as the basis for the productive exchange of information that will help to answer these questions by drawing together preliminary theoretical understandings sparking debate and disagreement raising new questions and directions and perhaps developing new world views Toward a Unified Theory of Problem Solving Mike U. When we learn new and complex materials our cognitive processing capabilities are usually severely reduced due to limited working memory capacity Learner expertise in a specific domain decreases those limitations by enabling the use of the expert's organised knowledge base In many instructional situations however expertise may also trigger additional cognitive load because of the processing of redundant information Recently strong evidence has emerged that instructional techniques which are highly effective with novice learners can lose their effectiveness and even have negative consequences when used with advanced learners As learners become more knowledgeable in a domain instructional techniques and procedures often need to change radically in order to remain efficient To tailor instruction to levels of learner knowledge in computer based learning environments it is critical to have a simple and rapid measure of learner expertise suitable for real time testing research based recommendations on instructional techniques and diagnostic assessment methods that are suitable for advanced learners in multimedia learning environments
