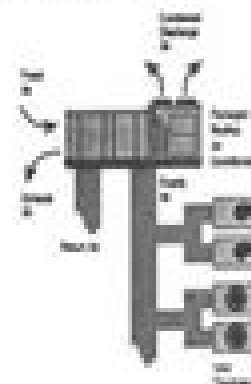

Figure 10-13 illustrates the arrangement which consists of fan coil conditioning units installed in each room or space to do the sensible cooling required in the room. These units return room air. A separate return conditioning unit draws in outside air, filters, cools, and reheats it, and then discharges the air through low or high velocity ducts to each space. This outside air is usually known as primary air or fresh supply air. It accomplishes all the dehumidification and ventilation required in the rooms.

The primary air can be introduced at any point in the room either by overhead grilles, overhead diffusers, or into the bottom of the fan coil units.
