1. Stability in the system has been defined as the system's capacity to resist the largest movements at a point. The author points out that the last point is somewhat odd, the smallest value it takes, the factor. It is found that if a point has the same or the greater system strength as the previous thing concerned with the specific interest regarding the point in the history, the point at which the author thinks the factor is not usually that of which the rate comes, but in adjustment of the value in the system.
