Although Parkinson s disease PD is historically seen as a hypokinetic disorder of movements including speech recent studies have suggested degradation of sensorimotor integration in PD Therefore this study addresses the following questions 1 Is there any sensory deficit in PD that correlates to the speech deficit 2 Do PD patients significantly differ from healthy individuals on this account A total of 36 participants included 12 PD patients 12 age matched geriatric healthy subjects GN and 12 young healthy subjects YN in the age group of 20 30 years All participants had normal cognitive function and normal hearing Sensory evaluations included Tests of Basic Auditory Capability TBAC and tests of labial mechanosensation by Johnson VanBoven Phillips probes JVP Speech performance was evaluated by a new analytic measure Guesstimate of Articulatory Performance GAP that extracts an overall score of formant transition from the acoustic signal and by two conventional perceptual measures Assessment of Intelligibility of Dysarthric Speech AIDS and Communication Efficiency Ratio CER Compared to the GN group The PD group showed significant deficits in mechanosensation and speech performance but not in auditory performance Compared to the YN group the GN group showed significant deficits in mechanosensation and auditory performance but not in speech performance Only the PD group showed a significant correlation between speech performance and mechanosensation The results suggest that motor speech deficits may not be normally associated with mechanosensory deficits but the association may be significant in PD A computational model was investigated for theoretical interpretation of the results This model was based on the Kalman principle of sensorimotor integration Selective lesioning of the model also indicate that simultaneous degradation of sensorimotor integration and mechanosensation may be intrinsic in hypokinetic dysarthria
