Abstract. The present study tested a model hypothesis in which the relationship between the frequency of sexual intercourse and the frequency of sexual satisfaction is mediated by the frequency of sexual desire. The results of a cross-sectional study of 1,000 heterosexual couples showed that the frequency of sexual intercourse was positively related to the frequency of sexual satisfaction, and that this relationship was mediated by the frequency of sexual desire. The results are discussed in terms of the importance of sexual desire in the relationship between sexual intercourse and sexual satisfaction.
