Chapter 10 Fuel System and Lubrication

The float valve is a critical part of the fuel system. It is responsible for maintaining a constant level of fuel in the float chamber. If the float valve is faulty, the fuel level will fluctuate, which can lead to poor engine performance. The float valve is located in the float chamber, which is a part of the carburetor. The float valve is made of metal and has a threaded section at the top. It is connected to a float arm, which is a lever that moves up and down as the fuel level changes. The float arm is connected to the needle valve, which is a valve that opens and closes to allow fuel to flow into the float chamber. When the fuel level is low, the float arm moves down, which opens the needle valve and allows fuel to flow into the float chamber. When the fuel level is high, the float arm moves up, which closes the needle valve and stops fuel from flowing into the float chamber.
