spans. It can include issues that haven't yet happened or issues that will occur (such as those you're in charge of creating). Issues in a business plan are a forecasting exercise. You're not predicting what will happen; you're predicting what you want to happen. You're not looking at what is; you're looking at what you want to be.

One can categorize business issues into three types. First, there's strategic issues, which are the big, long-term decisions that you're making. Second, there's tactical issues, which are the day-to-day decisions that you're making. Third, there's operational issues, which are the decisions that you're making about the details of your business. These three types of issues are all important, and they all need to be addressed in a business plan.

When you're creating a business plan, you need to think about all three types of issues. You need to think about the big, long-term decisions that you're making, the day-to-day decisions that you're making, and the details of your business. You need to think about all three types of issues, and you need to think about how they all fit together.

One way to think about business issues is to think about them in terms of scope and time. Scope refers to the breadth of the issue, and time refers to the duration of the issue. Strategic issues have a broad scope and a long time horizon. Tactical issues have a narrower scope and a shorter time horizon. Operational issues have a very narrow scope and a very short time horizon.

Another way to think about business issues is to think about them in terms of impact and control. Impact refers to the effect of the issue on the business, and control refers to the degree to which you can influence the issue. Strategic issues have a high impact and a low degree of control. Tactical issues have a moderate impact and a moderate degree of control. Operational issues have a low impact and a high degree of control.

By thinking about business issues in terms of scope, time, impact, and control, you can get a better understanding of what issues are most important to your business and how you can best address them.

So, when you're creating a business plan, make sure you're thinking about all three types of issues: strategic, tactical, and operational. And make sure you're thinking about them in terms of scope, time, impact, and control. That way, you can create a business plan that is both comprehensive and actionable.
