

What is a Research Question?

A research question guides and controls your research. It should be clear and focused, as well as specific enough to permit your logical argument. Even if your instructor has given you a specific assignment, the research question should identify for everything that you are interested in or want about the world or world-the "ask-about" paper and questions that can be answered in a few hundred sentences.

Examples:

1. For instance, the following question is too broad and does not fulfill the requirements of the analysis:

Why did the election come out that way?

(This question does not address which election or which year.)

2. Similarly, the following question could be answered by a hypothetical Internet search:

How many elections were held there in Portland, ME, in February in 2000?

(Similarly, this question could be answered in one sentence and does not have much to analyze. It could, however, become more for a larger assignment.)

3. A more precise question might be the following:

What are some of the environmental factors that occurred in Portland, ME between January and February 2000 that would cause elections to occur there?

(This question can lead to the author taking a stand on which factors are significant, and offers the writer an angle to which degree the results are beneficial or detrimental.)

How Do You Formulate a Good Research Question?

There is a general rule of thumb, and several preliminary questions, on this page to assist you in formulating a good research question. These will help determine what kinds of questions the topic generates.

Once you have considered preliminary questions, consider: What is the problem? Is it a problem at all? or will it be solved by a more general problem? Have you been considering preliminary questions that asking open-ended "How?" "What?" and "Why?" questions. They involve possible responses to those questions.
