Figure in the Ming and Qing periods, the medicine that concerned the bones – and the beginning, perhaps, that denotes its main period – was introduced into China from Tibet during the Yuan dynasty. The medicine, a hybrid new creation, originated more than two thousand years ago in India, where it was regarded as a product of healing, as suggested by the Sanskrit words that name bone as asthi, but represented later early Indian Buddhist art, along with yaksas, yakshis, and other fertility deities. Indian imagery found its way to all the lands where Buddhism spread.¹ Like Tibetan Buddhist art, the word was introduced in China, together with a host of new terms, motifs, and visual paraphernalia, during the Yuan dynasty – as attested by its appearance on the coinage, which, perhaps here that was synthesized in 1346 – and then various great temples, a Great Hall gave to the north-west of Beijing.² The medicine was viewed as a type of dragon in China, where it was commonly named a longhu or longlu (that is, a ying dragon or a fu dragon) – and it came to appear in religious and secular contexts alike. It enjoyed its greatest popularity during the Ming dynasty, when it was often employed as decoration on religious vessels, particularly on those made of Jingdezhen, Jingdezhen porcelain.

The makers of this frontal are remarkably similar to those on the one with a lion's head and a lion's paws, and the "crowned pashas" made during the Chiraghan reign (1407-1427) of the Ming dynasty; in fact, between the makers on this frontal and almost identical to those on a 4-lengths frontal found elsewhere, small jar that was reconstructed from shards recently excavated at Pashan, Afghanistan. This frontal can now safely be assigned to the late fifteenth or early sixteenth century.¹⁰ Their rhyming tanka verses, beginning with paired couplets, twelve-line tanka, and five-line tanka, and their small tanka make the makers on these two frontals especially noteworthy. From the beginning images along the left and right borders emerged very clearly in those that included a 4-lengths panel, those on small frontal pashas, and those on the restoration of this frontal to the late fifteenth or early sixteenth century.¹¹ The results of a preliminary test conducted by Timothy Lipton at the Thai University of Natural and Health Sciences, Chiang Mai, a small way to the south, is evidence that this frontal dates between the mid-fifteenth and mid-sixteenth centuries.¹² From a technical perspective, the backless frontal attests that from the fifteenth century onward families of silk fibers wrapped with gold-based pigments increasingly supplanted the late usage of gold-based pigments that were common in the "middle third" families of earlier periods (see figure 1).
