Massachusetts Bay during the fall and early winter Song development occurred gradually over weeks with vocalizations transitioning from non song calls to song fragments to full songs Initially sporadic in occurrence singing began in September but was not regularly heard until late October when full songs were common I found evidence that the onset of regular singing occurs earlier at lower latitudes longer photoperiods and higher temperatures The theme order in early season full songs was variable until December when theme order became more consistent with what was observed the previous spring Dominican Republic breeding ground songs recorded in January and March were crystalized in terms of theme order Song duration increased gradually through the breeding season Spring song cessation was only captured at a single site season in Canada and compared to song development it was abrupt with few song fragments These late season songs had consistent theme orders I propose that the patterns observed here may in part be driven by physiological processes like those of songbirds
